If nominees can sell shares, why not real estate?

TRUTH BE TOLD
HARSH ROONGTA

My friend Hemant submitted papers to transfer his late father's mutual fund units on a Monday. The units were credited on Wednesday. It took less than 48 hours. His brother, a non-resident Indian (NRI) and joint nominee, applied two months later. He got his units just as quickly. Hemant's father also owned a flat in a Mumbai housing society. The society transferred it to the brothers as nominees. But they were treated as provisional members. They could not deal with the flat without a court order. The process took close to a year. It cost more than ₹2 lakh.

The contrast between Hemant's two experiences is not accidental. The law is the same in both cases. A nominee holds any asset only on behalf of the legal heirs. But market realities change the outcome. In financial assets, a buyer cannot tell if the seller is a nominee or an owner. The nominee can sell or redeem at any time. This converts the asset into cash. If other heirs have a claim, they must chase that cash in court. This rarely happens. In property, a nominee cannot give a clear title. The buyer must verify ownership. This is why a court order becomes necessary.

The law offers multiple ways to convert provisional membership into ownership. Some depend on a will. Others depend on personal law when there is no will. Both routes involve going to court. This is slow and expensive. In many states, court fees are linked to the value of the property. There is a non-court option through a legal heirship certificate issued by the revenue authorities. It is cheap on paper. But it involves repeated visits, delays, and unofficial payments. Buyers and lenders often distrust it, reducing the sale value of the property. A family arrangement is another route. But it is not clearly defined. Housing societies are reluctant to rely on it.

The Securities and Exchange Board of India (Sebi) and the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) have already shown that easy transmission is possible when the owner has recorded nominees. Transmission refers to the transfer of assets to nominees or legal heirs after the death of the holder. Where a valid nomination exists, only a few specific documents can be asked for. These include the death certificate, a simple transmission form, and the nominee's know your customer (KYC) proof. Extra requirements are not allowed. If there are multiple nominees, the applying nominee can receive their share immediately. The balance is held in escrow until the others apply. RBI has built further on this framework. It imposes penalties for delay. It also recognises successive nominations, so a backup nominee can step in if the original nominee predeceases the investor.

These reforms cover only part of the problem. State governments, which regulate real estate, have not moved in this direction. The solution is simple. If a person registers a nominee with the housing society or the sub-registrar, that nomination should have the same effect as a will for that property. The nominee should be able to deal with the property as a full owner. This is already the case for financial assets. If other legal heirs have a dispute, they can pursue it separately against the nominee. But a buyer who purchases from the nominee should be fully protected.

Truth be told, the system has pushed Hemant towards a dramatic decision. He has decided that when he dies, he will leave his heirs only the home he lives in. Every other asset will be in a form where his children can claim what is theirs without taking time off work or going to court. He does not want them to go through what he went through.

If financial regulators can make transmission of securities and bank deposits swift and certain, there is no why reason state governments cannot do the same for real estate. Until they do, more people will reach the same conclusion as Hemant and ask: Why leave behind an asset that becomes a burden rather than a bequest?

TIGHTER CREDIT CARD UNDERWRITING

Facing approval issues? Apply for FD-backed or add-on card

Consistent credit behaviour for six months can improve your score

HIMALI PATEL

Indian banks are likely to become more cautious in issuing credit cards, as the West Asia conflict and the fall in stock markets have made them more risk-averse, according to media reports. They are expected to further tighten their underwriting standards.

Why are norms being tightened

Experts say there has been a gradual tightening over the past year, driven by both regulatory intervention and rising risk sensitivity. "Following the Reserve Bank of India's (RBI) higher risk weights on unsecured lending in late 2023, lenders have shifted from aggressive customer acquisition to more calibrated sourcing. The focus has moved towards stronger borrower profiles, with closer scrutiny on income stability, leverage, and repayment behaviour," says Adhil Shetty, chief executive officer (CEO), BankBazaar. He adds that whenever unsecured credit expands rapidly, a phase of tightening typically follows.

Growing macroeconomic uncertainty could lead to further tightening of underwriting standards. "Lenders regard unsecured lending, particularly credit cards, as intrinsically susceptible to fluctuations in the economy. Banks prioritise asset quality over ambitious expansion in response to any signs of stress, such as possible revenue disruptions, rising living expenses, or unstable markets," says Shams Tabrej, co-founder & CEO, Ezeepay.

The impact

During such a phase, credit assessment becomes more disciplined. Banks may raise the minimum acceptable credit scores, especially for new-to-credit applicants. "First-time applicants may witness longer approval times or higher rejection rates and requests for more documentation," says Tabrej. Even after a card is approved, it may come with lower initial credit limits to reduce early-stage risk. "More first-time applicants may be offered secured cards or entry-level product options, instead of full-fledged unsecured cards," says Tabrej.

Segments that will be affected more

New-to-credit customers, workers in the gig economy or informal sector, self-employed individuals with variable income, and customers with weak or inconsistent credit records are likely to be most impacted.

Those with multiple recent credit enquiries may also see higher rejection rates. "Customers already carrying high credit utilisation levels, typically above 30-40 per cent, are likely to face tighter filters," says Shetty.

On the other hand, salaried individuals with steady incomes and customers with a clean repayment history are likely to be less impacted.

"Consumers with an existing relationship with the bank have much higher chances of card approval," says Santosh Agarwal, CEO, Paisabazaar.

What vulnerable applicants should do

New-to-credit customers should use digital payment platforms to create a transaction trail. "Maintaining a stable bank balance and regular income inflow can strengthen their profile," says Vijay Anand MV, head of strategy, Zolve.

"Starting with short-term, low-cost credit products, such as micro-loans or buy-now-pay-later (BNPL) products, and repaying them on time can help," says Tabrej.

Ensuring every payment is made on time is critical for new entrants. "Applying selectively to credit products and avoiding multiple applications in a short span can improve the odds of approval," says Anand MV. Shetty adds that each enquiry remains on the credit report for up to 12 months and can temporarily pull down the score. Financial and KYC (know your customer) records should be accurate and up-to-date.

Those with a weak credit history should pay off outstanding loans and avoid further delinquencies. They should also adopt the methods described above. Even three to six months of healthy credit habits can materially improve the odds.

Products that ease entry

A fixed deposit (FD)-backed card or a low-limit entry card can help build an early repayment track record. "A secured credit card could be an ideal entry point since it offers guaranteed approval due to collateral backing. By using it in a responsible manner, customers can build their credit score in a few months," says Agarwal. She informs that several FD-backed cards are available in the market that have low FD requirements, making them accessible to a wider demography.

Add-on cards are ideal for young earners or family members who can rely on the primary cardholder's strong credit profile. Young salaried individuals may apply for cards from the bank with which they have their salary account. This is effective since the bank already has visibility on their income flows.

Watch out for red flags

During periods of tighter underwriting, secured cards, high-fee cards, or products with complicated reward structures tend to become more visible. "This is because such cards are easier to approve or are more profitable," says Rahul Sheth, vice president, BUSINESSNEXT. Customers must be watchful about being handed a poor-quality card.

"If the rewards are too complex, expire quickly, or come with multiple conditions, that's a red flag," says Sheth. He cautions that a high annual fee without clear or easily usable benefits is another red flag. Agarwal emphasises that customers should review how much value each point delivers, exclusions, and caps on earnings before choosing a card.
